Dissertation

The dissertation argues that the modernization of the fiscal apparatus was product of an inter-elite bargaining process between the agricultural and industrial classes. The dissertation is embedded into a larger book project where I analyze how these structural transformations helped states to make institutional investments that lead to the formation of states with higher capacities. Using fine-grained historical case study comparisons, sectoral outputs from 1900 to the present, time-series econometric techniques and a novel earthquake dataset (to measure state capacities), I find that industrialization challenged the traditional sector, creating the incentives to self-impose state institutions.
