Teaching Statement

Teaching Philosophy. As an instructor, my goal has always been to sow the seed of curiosity, since that it is the first stepping stone of learning. One of the major challenges of teaching comparative politics is that, as any social science, it is a stream of conflicting theories, approaches, and methodologies. My belief is that this is overwhelming for students, hence my teaching philosophy is to serve as a guide in the process of discovering what comparative politics is.

In the spring semester of 2018, I am scheduled to teach the Introduction to Comparative Politics course at Tulane University, for which I have developed a broad, but very interesting syllabus. I designed it having in mind not only thinking about how to retain the interest of political science / global studies majors, but also thinking about how to captivate and motivate prospective students. And while I put heavy weight on participation, my experience teaching at Rutgers has taught me how to create a classroom environment of intellectual curiosity and collective respect. My number one rule is to approach all these big and interesting questions by presenting the material in such way that my students feel intrigued and curious about it. I believe this to be the main ingredient to form individuals who can think critically and navigate the major debates in the field. Not only from a theoretical perspective, but also from an applied point of view.

As a teaching assistant at Rutgers, I was fortunate enough to teach in one of the most diverse schools in the country. As an engaging instructor, I always took pedagogical advantage of this situation by bringing into the classroom many examples from different parts of the world. Given the diversity of the Rutgers' student body, it was almost always the case that I had a student from my example country. The opportunity I had of teaching in diverse environments gave me extensive training in how to approach controversial issues, and also in how to present the material in an interesting way for all students, regardless of their different cultural and economic backgrounds. You can access my diversity statement here.

I have not only taught at the undergraduate level, but I have also served as a teaching assistant at the graduate level too. In the fall of 2015, I served as the TA of the Introduction to Statistics course taught by Professor Beth Leech. It was a great experience. For instance, I gave a talk on how to present statistical models in an appealing and intuitive way. I engaged my fellow graduate students in a way such that they could not only see how statistical results should look like, but also how to actually do it.

In the winter of 2015, I had the opportunity to teach the Math Camp and Introduction to Computing course that ran all day for an entire week. The course was intended for first-year graduate students, and it covered all necessary elements to perform well in the methods sequence. I designed the syllabus so we could spend two days working on calculus, two days on matrix algebra, and one full day on computing. In general, this is a complex subject matter to teach; it requires superb organizational and teaching skills. I decided then to adopt a no child left behind policy. This is actually very important to me. Not only in this particular context, but in any class I have taught. Shy students with unanswered questions perceive no benefit if the instructor is only "engaging." I believe it is fundamental to create an atmosphere of constructive learning, and an environment of tolerance that fosters the notion that we (i.e, students and myself) are finding the possible answers together. That is why I feel it is fundamental to reward all sorts of possible questions. It is by asking multiple questions that we learn and stimulate an environment that cradles learning and curiosity. Almost every lecture I have ever given adapts to the students' questions, creating an environment of discussion and "nutritive" debate. Rephrasing and re-framing students' questions allows me to accomplish these goals while still sticking to the syllabus.

Finally, one important aspect of belonging to an active academic community is the opportunity to mentor students, both graduate and undergraduate. For this reason, I always served as a graduate student mentor. In doing so, I had the opportunity to help incoming students with their transition into graduate school. At the undergraduate level, I always provided advice to interested undergraduate students wanting to pursue a career and/or a PhD/MA in political science. As an undergraduate, I still remember how important mentoring for me was in my final decision to apply for graduate school.

Teaching Interests. Going forward, I would like to teach courses in comparative politics, political economy of development, Latin American politics, and applied methods courses. However, I can be quite flexible and take care of the demands the department has. Please check my research agenda and see how my teaching and research interests match. Below I describe a potential list of courses:

- Substantive Courses:
  - Introduction to Comparative Politics (syllabus).
  - Political Regimes and Regime Change.
  - Introduction to Political Economy (syllabus).
  - Economic History and Political Economy.
  - Introduction to Latin American Politics (syllabus).
- Methods courses:
  - Applied Quantitative Methods in Political Science.
  - Research Design / Epistemology in Political Science.
  - Introduction to Quantitative Methods in Political Science.
  - Experimental Methodology.

Sample Student Evaluations and Teaching References.

Professor Dr. Ross Baker, Distinguished Professor - Rutgers University, has more details about my teaching skills. His letter can be accessed via the Interfolio system. Please let me know if you wish to read the letter. Also, you can always send me an email to receive the latest teaching evaluations. However, here I summarize some of my student's comments I have received during my three years of teaching assistant experience:

- "The TA is very responsive when spoken to and is quick to answer questions via email. The TA's willingness to learn with us is also helpful in learning the material and allows us to have nice discussions in class."
- "My TA showed he knew his subject material because he was able to answer hard and complicated questions efficiently despite it being obvious that English was not his first language."
- "Hector showed me how to make connections with government terms. He made the big picture seem simpler for me."
- "Over the break, I came to the conclusion that I want to major in political science. American Government was the first course I ever took related to political science, and I loved it."
- "I am very grateful for your help and will definitely reach out to you to ask questions about Comparative Politics if that's what I eventually plan on doing. I feel like I'm very new to this whole field of study - mainly because I haven't been in the US for a very long time, and because of the way the government works so differently here than in Pakistan, where I'm from."
- "The teaching assistant really helped me to think about all the "why" aspects of the material. Like for example, "Why is this important?" or "Why does this relate to the material?"."
- "The best TA in teaching the course material. Each recitation session is well compact with main concepts crucial for understanding the course material."
- "As an international student who takes the course for requirement, the TA have greatly increase my interest in politics, increase my awareness of politics."
- "Hector Bahamonde was very engaging and I learned alot in recitation. I liked that he was always prepared with examples to relate what we learn in class to today's world. He has a very cool perspective on politics."
- "I think everything was perfect with the recitations."
- "Easily the best TA I have had at Rutgers. He engaged the class, and presented the material in an interesting and extremely organized manner. I was nervous about taking this class because it is not one of my specialties, but after the first recitation I realized that I would learn a lot and Hector really changed my attitude towards taking the class."
- "Hector encourages us to get involved during recitation. Normally I wouldn't raise my hand as often, but he makes it easy to participate in class."
